Transformative Learning Story Guidelines

The description of Transformative Learning can be found on the SARN website (www.sarn.ca). To tell your story, try to stay below 1500 words and it is suggested you structure your story like this:

- Could you describe how you have changed? For instance, do you now see yourself or the world differently as a result of being in literacy/basic education?

- Why? Was there a "trigger" of some sort that seemed to lead to this change? Was there a series of events or influences? Why do you think this change occurred?

- When did the change seem to occur?

- What could others learn from your experience?

Stories may be edited by SARN editors. Stories will be published on the SARN blog, space permitting, without identifying authors' names and without identifying any program names or locations. Authors may, however, choose fictitious names, in which case this will be stated on the publication. If authors choose to identify their own names and/or program, this permission must be given in writing from the author(s) and a representative of the institution respectively.

If you have any questions or completed stories, please email them to Dr. Allan Quigley (aquigley@stfx.ca) or Jacqueline Bruce (jbruce0116@hotmail.com).
